When we withdraw it makes things worse

By Maj. Donny Crandell

That's because the person who pushes the issue generally gets more frustrated and angry each time the withdrawer pulls away. And that makes the pursuer push harder—which makes the withdrawer withdraw more, leaving the issue completely unsolved. So what can you do?

- Remember you're a team—you're talking to find a solution, not to win
- Remember that your action will cause a reaction
- Start an important discussion gently and talk calmly—raising your voice doesn't help
- If your partner withdraws, don't push the issue. Take a time out and reschedule discussion
- Talk with your partner about the fact that avoiding a problem won't make it go away
- Look for evidence that the withdrawer cares about you—it's usually the issue, not you
- Withdrawing can be reduced when pushing is reduced

Robert Cloys)

When Col. Adrienne Williams, 387th Air Expeditionary Group commander, was only 10 years old, she knew she wanted to follow in her father's footsteps by serving in the world's greatest Air Force.

The military way of life was never new to her. Williams spent majority of her childhood in Colorado Springs, Colorado where her father, retired United States Air Force Col. Kenneth Fleming, worked. From an early age, her parents provided her with a stable foundation and inspiration to shoot for her dreams, no matter what the obstacle may be. "My parents always told me, 'you can be and do anything you want to do, just believe in yourself,' Williams said. "Around third grade, I attended a USAFA graduation. Toward the end of the ceremony, all the kids were allowed to run on the field and catch the NEVADA AIR NATIONAL GUARD BASE, Nev.--Retired Chief Master Sgt. Denise Jelinski-Hall, visited the Nevada Air National Guard base during the March unit training assembly. In honor of Women's History Month, Senior Master Sgt. Angela Ash, the 152nd Airlift Wing's Human Resource Advisor, wanted to bring a speaker to the base that would inspire and motivate the Airmen. She couldn't think of a better person than Jelinski-Hall.

From the moment Ash heard about this woman, who had achieved the highest enlisted position ever held by a woman in the United States Military, she knew that Jelinski-Hall would bring some wise words to the Airmen of the Nevada Air Guard.

"When I was working at National Guard Bureau, I worked in Family Programs and our team got invited to a 'United through Reading' event. I was fortunate enough to be seated with the Chief and her family. That was my first 'in person' introduction to her—even though I had heard about her long before that—when she became the highest enlisted woman to the Joint Chiefs of NGB. I was mesmerized and curious about her."

Ash said she wanted the Nevada Air National Guard Airmen to know they could achieve great things, "Chief is an extraordinary woman—but she is a regular woman and I wanted the Airmen to know that a regular person could achieve great things. Especially our young airmen who are just starting off. All of them have the potential to get to that position.
